Comments

The policy as written is a big step away from freedom of speech and assembly. Make one wonder if it is even possible to equitably apply a policy when administrators will be sanctioning students who had no idea what sanctions might result from their actions. (Such as joining with 51 likeminded classmates to yell at the administration on the quad - oh the horror). Nor does it say what exactly the penalties might be. Thinking up penalties on the fly is a recipe for problems down the road when it is discovered that there are (inevitably) differences in how it is applied to particular cases and/or causes.

The resolution, though well-meaning, is obsolete and not constructive in forging a path ahead.

Two comments from my colleagues. In favor: This is a no-brainer. Faculty has to assert control over the University. Administrators should not be making decisions about freedom of expression. Not in favor: The resolution seems a bit overwrought as nothing seems new in the CU Policy. Rather the Policy just brings all of the dispirit component that already existed together across the University into one document. Also there seems to be an incomplete understanding of the responsibilities and rights of free speech. It would be nice if the resolution (and Policy for that matter) actually addressed the issue of acceptable and/or new forums to allow for "expressive activities" or discussion. The main issue seems to be the issue of "being heard" without being dismissed or ignored - ie meaningful dialogue with respect for all.

Would have preferred a more narrow resolution addressing the input of the Senate versus specific requirements; there needs to be a balance between the need to get things "done" and to have full consensus.

I'm voting to support Senate discussion of the Interim Expressive Activity Policy, with reservations. The resolution is out of date. In fact the administration has responded to debate and input, and some of the measures listed in the resolution have been revised.

---

I do not believe the resolution successfully made the argument that this is about educational policy or under the jurisdiction of the Faculty Senate.

---

Many discussions had on March Senator meeting. It should take more discussions.

---

The resolution misses the biggest issue and that is the disruption that is going on. These disruptions are severe and we should demand the administration to be very strong against them. Instead, the resolution discuss issues that are much less important as if they are the big issue.

---

I fully support the resolution. It will be extremely disappointing if the Cornell Administration goes ahead and finalizes the Interim Expressive Activity policy with this much opposition. It is a reactionary policy; it makes us (Cornell) look extremely bad. It's not needed. What is needed is allowing open, free expression and upholding the right to peaceful protest without childish, unnecessary limitations (no sticks for posters, no candles, no more than 50 people, etc). Most egregious is the arrest of students and staff that are peacefully protesting. This is a dangerous slippery slope that I would have thought the Cornell Administration would have avoided, but it's now digging itself into a bigger hole of authoritarianism. President Pollack's and Kotlickoff's article in the Cornell Daily Sun was laughable - as if these student protestors are really a threat to working at Cornell.

I do not support this resolution as written

I found the university's explanation that ultimate authority for the expression policy falls under the purview of the University Assembly to be compelling, and further found the changes already made to the policy to be demonstrative of a collaborative approach with the faculty senate. Thus, I find this policy to be potentially antagonistic, and not sufficiently conducive to obtaining the improvements we seek.

---

I think that, involving Senate in the development of the policy is crucial to the legitimacy of the process and eventually for the policy adopted..

---

I missed the opportunity to sign on as a cosponsor but I am absolutely in favor of the resolution.

---

The proposed resolution focuses on process and makes an assumption that when it comes to expressive activity, "anything goes". It ignores the fact that many community members are feeling harassed and scared by such activity. I think there is room for certain regulations that allow expressive activity to take place without putting community members, specifically individuals from certain groups, at a position of fear.

I support the role of faculty in crafting this-
